How to Develop Your Own Inner Nurturing Voice

When no one is around and I NEED a HUG—I wrap my arms around ME and give myself a HUG! I tell myself, "I love you, Bobby sweetheart. You are wonderful!" This felt very odd and unnatural at first. But I thought that if I could hit me over the head and speak meanly to me—as I had done on many times before, then I could certainly give myself a hug and a kiss; just as I would to a loving friend.

Oh Bobby, I love you...

as you are and as you are not.

Part of the root of my low self-esteem came from having delight deficiency syndrome. I didn’t take enough time to care for my soul, spirit, and body in nurturing ways. I found that deep down I didn’t feel worthwhile. For me, applied self-esteem was learning how to take time for activities that fill up my well of reserve; so, from that well, I then take time to help others.

For me the daily practice of:

- Preparing yummy meals and snacks
- Of bringing a food bag with me so I could eat whenever I’m hungry
- Taking time for loving social connections
- Finding fun ways to be active on a regular basis
- Taking time to provide a rich treasure chest of nurturing activities for me
- Making time for daily prayer and meditation and retreats on a regular basis
- Keeping my life in enough balance so that I can regularly apply all of these ideas

Just like a baby or child crying, you pay attention.

Embrace your pain and confusion as a loving mother would toward her child.

Talk with yourself:

Oh, sweetheart, what is the matter? What do you need? I am here for you.
I will not abandon you and I love you.
I hear that you are in pain. Can you tell me about it? Take your time.
Let me know when you are ready. I don’t want to rush you or invalidate your feelings.
I will always be here for you.
So, let me know what hurts. Is there anything I can do to help?

© By Bob Wilson www.balancedweightmanagement.com